Options: A) True; B) False

Note: Programmed decisions are considered true as they involve repetitive situations where established procedures and guidelines can be consistently applied to achieve standard outcomes.

Long Form Response

11. Answer: Motive development in consumer behavior refers to the process through which consumers identify their needs and desires, leading to the recognition of a problem that requires resolution. This concept is rooted in the imbalance between a consumer's actual state-what they currently possess or experience-and their desired state-what they aspire to achieve or acquire. When consumers perceive a gap between these two states, it generates a motivational drive to address the discrepancy, prompting them to seek solutions through purchasing decisions. This recognition of a problem often triggers an evaluation of options, as consumers aim to restore balance and satisfy their unmet needs. Ultimately, understanding motive development is crucial for marketers, as it informs strategies to effectively engage consumers and influence their buying behavior.

Note: correct because it effectively outlines how the disparity between a consumer's current situation and their goals creates a motivational drive that leads to problem recognition, which is central to understanding motive development in consumer behavior.

12. Answer: Transformational leaders possess a strategic thinking and outlook that emphasizes long- term vision and adaptability to change, which significantly influences organizational change and employee motivation. By articulating a clear and inspiring vision, these leaders align their team's efforts with organizational goals, fostering a sense of purpose among employees. Their ability to anticipate challenges and innovate solutions encourages a culture of continuous improvement and engagement. Furthermore, transformational leaders empower employees by involving them in decision-making processes, which enhances motivation and commitment to the organization's success. Overall, their strategic approach not only drives effective change but also cultivates a motivated workforce ready to embrace transformation.

Note: correct because it highlights how transformational leaders foster a long-term vision and adaptability, which not only aligns organizational goals with employee efforts but also cultivates a culture of engagement and continuous improvement, ultimately driving change and motivation within the organization.
