Long Form Response

11. Answer: Locus of control refers to the degree to which individuals believe they have control over the outcomes of events in their lives, divided into two types: internal and external. Those with an internal locus of control perceive that their actions directly influence their success and decisions, fostering a sense of personal agency and responsibility in a business context. In contrast, individuals with an external locus of control attribute outcomes to external factors such as luck or fate, which can diminish their motivation and engagement in decision-making processes. This perception significantly influences how employees approach challenges, take initiative, and respond to feedback, ultimately affecting organizational dynamics and performance. Understanding locus of control is crucial for leaders, as it can inform strategies to empower employees and enhance their sense of agency in their professional roles.

Note: correct because it clearly defines locus of control, distinguishes between internal and external types, and explains how these perceptions influence an individual's sense of agency and decision-making in a business context.

12. Answer: Experiential consumption refers to the process where consumers seek out sensory, emotional, and cognitive experiences associated with products rather than just their functional benefits. This concept is closely linked to hedonic consumption, which emphasizes pleasure and enjoyment derived from the consumption process. As consumers increasingly prioritize experiences over mere ownership, businesses must adapt their marketing strategies to highlight the experiential aspects of their offerings, such as storytelling and immersive brand experiences. This shift in focus can lead to stronger emotional connections between consumers and brands, ultimately influencing purchasing decisions and fostering brand loyalty. By understanding the implications of experiential consumption, marketers can better cater to consumer desires for meaningful and enjoyable interactions with products.

Note: The answer correctly identifies that experiential consumption focuses on the emotional and sensory experiences associated with products, which aligns with hedonic consumption's emphasis on pleasure, thereby necessitating that businesses adapt their marketing strategies to emphasize these experiential elements in order to resonate with consumers' evolving preferences.
