Long Form Response

11. Answer: Bulk-gaining industries are those in which the final product weighs more or has a greater volume than the raw materials used in its production. Bottled orange juice is a prime example of this type of industry because the process of juicing oranges and packaging the juice results in a product that is heavier and more valuable than the individual oranges. In production, oranges are harvested, processed, and then transformed into juice, which is bottled for distribution. This process not only adds value but also creates jobs in agriculture, manufacturing, and distribution, significantly impacting the economy. The demand for bottled orange juice also illustrates how bulk-gaining industries can influence local economies by supporting citrus farming and related industries.

Note: correct because it accurately describes how bottled orange juice qualifies as a bulk-gaining industry by illustrating the transformation of lighter raw oranges into a heavier, more valuable final product through processing and packaging.
