12. Answer: The end of the Cold War significantly influenced geopolitical stability in Eastern Europe by leading to the collapse of communist regimes and the redefinition of national borders. As the Soviet Union weakened, many Eastern European countries gained independence, which initially seemed to promote stability. However, this shift also uncovered deep-rooted ethnic tensions and historical grievances that had been suppressed during communist rule. As nations sought to assert their identities, conflicts emerged, particularly in places like Yugoslavia, where ethnic groups fought for control and recognition. Thus, while the end of the Cold War brought about political freedom, it also set the stage for ethnic conflicts that challenged the newfound stability in the region.

Note: correct because it identifies that the end of the Cold War led to both the collapse of communist regimes and the rise of national identities in Eastern Europe, which, while initially promoting independence and stability, also exposed and intensified existing ethnic tensions and historical grievances that resulted in conflicts.
