Long Form Response

11. Answer: In Aquinas's natural law theory, intrinsic goods are fundamental values that are inherently valuable and contribute to human flourishing. These goods, such as life, knowledge, and friendship, are significant because they guide moral action and establish a framework for discerning what is good. Aquinas argues that these intrinsic goods are interrelated; for instance, the pursuit of knowledge enhances one's understanding of friendship and life itself. This interconnectedness underscores the holistic nature of Aquinas's ethical framework, as the realization of one intrinsic good often supports the attainment of others, ultimately aligning human actions with divine law. Thus, intrinsic goods serve as both the foundation and a guiding compass within Aquinas's moral philosophy, illustrating the profound relationship between human nature and ethical conduct.

Note: correct because it accurately identifies intrinsic goods in Aquinas's natural law theory as essential values that promote human flourishing, emphasizes their role in guiding moral action, and highlights their interrelated nature, which illustrates the holistic approach of Aquinas's ethical framework.

12. Answer: Feinberg's perspective on human desires, particularly in the context of hunger, challenges traditional classifications by arguing that such desires cannot be neatly categorized as either intrinsic or extrinsic. He posits that hunger reflects a complex interplay of biological, psychological, and social factors, which defy simple classification. This complexity suggests that desires are not solely motivated by internal needs or external circumstances, but rather by a dynamic relationship between the two. Consequently, Feinberg emphasizes the inadequacy of conventional frameworks in fully capturing the nuanced nature of human desires, particularly as they relate to fundamental needs like hunger. Thus, he concludes that neither traditional intrinsic nor extrinsic classifications can encompass the depth of human motivation.

Note: correct because it captures Feinberg's argument that hunger is a multifaceted desire influenced by various intertwined factors, which complicates its classification as either intrinsic or extrinsic.
