

Multiple Choice

1. Answer: D

Options: A) It leads to a diminished focus on collective security; B) It diminishes the prospects for world government; C) It enhances the prospects for world government; D) It leads to a diminished focus on security, power and interest

Note: Realists argue that exceptionalism fosters a moralistic approach to foreign policy that prioritizes ideals over national security, power dynamics, and pragmatic interests, ultimately undermining a nation's strategic objectives.

2. Answer: D

Options: A) the president of the United States.; B) the secretary of defense.; C) the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.; D) Congress.

Note: The power to declare war rests with Congress as outlined in Article I, Section 8 of the U.S. Constitution, which grants this authority to the legislative branch to ensure a system of checks and balances between the branches of government.

3. Answer: B

Options: A) All of the world's leading economies were declining due to low growth and inflation; B) The United States could no longer remain a superpower and was in decline; C) The soft power of the United States would allow it to avoid decline; D) The rise of Japan had been exaggerated

Note: Paul Kennedy argued that the United States, due to its overextension in military and economic commitments while facing rising challenges from other powers, was on a trajectory of decline that would undermine its status as a superpower.

4. Answer: D

Options: A) on nuclear weapons signed between the United States and the Soviet Union.; B) cutting conventional arms in Europe.; C) to be rejected by the U.S. Senate.; D) mandating the elimination of many long-range nuclear missiles.

Note: The Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty (START) was groundbreaking as it established the first legally binding framework for the reduction and elimination of long-range nuclear missile arsenals, marking a significant step towards arms control during the Cold War.

5. Answer: B

Options: A) They allow the US to withdraw from the international arena; B) They serve American interests; C) The US is incapable of acting alone; D) None of the above

Note: Liberal Internationalists argue that international institutions are important to US grand strategy because they help promote and stabilize a rules-based international order that aligns with and advances American political, economic, and security interests.

True / False

6. Answer: False

Options: A) True; B) False

Note: The General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) was established in 1947, not at the Bretton Woods Conference, which took place in 1944, and it was primarily focused on reducing tariffs and promoting international trade rather than directly stabilizing the global economy.

7. Answer: True

Options: A) True; B) False

Note: Diplomacy is primarily a means of negotiation and dialogue aimed at resolving conflicts and fostering international relations, whereas economic tools of security policy specifically involve the use of financial instruments like sanctions, trade agreements, and foreign aid to influence state behavior.

8. Answer: False

Options: A) True; B) False

Note: Rosenau argues that U.S. foreign policy behavior is influenced by a complex interplay of various factors, including institutional dynamics, historical context, and global circumstances, rather than solely by the personality of the President.

9. Answer: False

Options: A) True; B) False

Note: This statement is false because postcolonial theory acknowledges various forms of violence beyond material, epistemic, and structural, including symbolic and cultural violence, reflecting the complexity of power dynamics and oppression in postcolonial contexts.

10. Answer: True

Options: A) True; B) False

Note: China is considered a state actor because it is a recognized sovereign nation with a centralized government that engages in international relations and has the capacity to influence global politics and security dynamics, distinguishing it from nonstate actors such as terrorist groups or multinational corporations.

Long Form Response

11. Answer: Some governmental regimes hesitate to fully embrace liberalism due to concerns about losing control over their political systems and the potential for instability that comes with increased freedoms and open markets. These regimes often fear that liberal policies could lead to heightened demands for democracy and accountability, undermining their authority. The fear of recurring cooperation, where groups may form coalitions to challenge the regime, is not a valid justification for this reluctance, as it overlooks the potential benefits of liberalism, such as economic growth, social cohesion, and the fostering of political stability through inclusive governance. By rejecting liberalism based on this fear, regimes may inadvertently cultivate the very unrest they seek to avoid, as repression can lead to resentment and a more determined opposition. Ultimately, the reluctance to embrace liberalism reflects a short-sighted prioritization of immediate control over long-term societal benefits.

Note: correct because it identifies the key concerns of governmental regimes-loss of control and potential instability-as reasons for their reluctance to embrace liberalism, while also arguing that the fear of coalition-building against the regime does not provide a legitimate basis for rejecting liberal reforms.

12. Answer: Since the end of the Cold War, the geopolitical landscape has significantly influenced Western powers' strategies in coercive diplomacy, particularly towards weak and failing states. The prevailing environment, marked by overwhelming Western military superiority and a diminished risk of great power intervention, has incentivized Western policymakers to aggressively pursue their agendas in these regions. This has resulted in a focus on managing armed conflicts and stabilizing governance in weak states, often through a combination of military intervention, economic sanctions, and diplomatic pressure. Consequently, the lack of formidable opposition has allowed Western powers to implement coercive strategies with relative impunity, aiming to reshape political landscapes in accordance with their interests. This dynamic reflects a broader trend of Western interventionism in areas perceived as vulnerable, driven by both security concerns and the desire to promote liberal democratic values.

Note: correct because it identifies the impact of Western military dominance and reduced great power rivalries post-Cold War on the aggressive implementation of coercive diplomacy to address instability and governance challenges in weak and failing states.
