Long Form Response

11. Answer: The United Nations Security Council (UNSC) is structured with five permanent members- China, France, Russia, the United Kingdom, and the United States-each possessing veto power, alongside ten rotating members elected for two-year terms without such authority. This arrangement reflects a balance between the interests of major global powers and the representation of a broader international community. The veto power held by permanent members allows them to block substantive resolutions, which can lead to significant implications for global governance, often resulting in inaction during crises when consensus is not achieved. Conversely, the rotating members provide a platform for diverse perspectives but lack the influence to challenge the decisions of the permanent members, highlighting a structural imbalance that can affect the effectiveness and legitimacy of the UNSC in addressing international security issues. Thus, while the structure aims to maintain stability, it can also hinder the Council's responsiveness to global challenges.

Note: The answer accurately identifies the structural composition of the UNSC, emphasizing the significant influence of the five permanent members through their veto power, while also acknowledging the role of rotating members, which collectively illustrates the tension between major power interests and broader international representation in global governance.

12. Answer: New critical schools of security studies have significantly reshaped the field by challenging traditional notions of security that prioritize state-centric and military-oriented perspectives. These schools advocate for a broader understanding of security that includes human security, environmental concerns, and the role of non-state actors, thereby redefining the boundaries of the discipline. Their relationship with international relations is complex, as they both draw from and critique conventional IR theories, pushing the discipline toward inclusivity and reflexivity. This evolving dynamic suggests that security studies occupies a unique position between academic inquiry and practical application, often bridging the gap between theoretical frameworks and real-world challenges faced by practitioners. Ultimately, the emergence of these new critical perspectives has profound implications for the identity of security studies, positioning it as a more interdisciplinary and socially engaged field within political science.

Note: correct because it emphasizes how new critical schools of security studies expand the traditional focus of the discipline by incorporating diverse perspectives on security that address human, environmental, and non-state actor concerns, which in turn complicates and enriches the relationship with international relations and the overall identity of the field.
