Long Form Response

11. Answer: The Digambara sect of Jainism holds specific beliefs regarding the role of women, particularly in the context of semi-renunciation. Digambaras believe that women cannot achieve full spiritual liberation without first being reborn as men, which reflects their view that women are at a disadvantage in attaining the highest spiritual goals. This contrasts with the Svetambara sect, which believes that women can attain liberation in their current form. Overall, the Digambara practices emphasize strict asceticism and often require male monks to renounce all possessions, while women are seen as less capable of following these rigorous paths. Thus, the differences in beliefs about women's spiritual potential highlight a significant divergence between the Digambara and other Jain groups.

Note: The answer correctly identifies the Digambara belief that women must be reborn as men to achieve full spiritual liberation, contrasting it with the Svetambara view that women can attain liberation in their current form, thus highlighting the differing beliefs and practices regarding semi-renunciation within Jainism.
