Long Form Response

11. Answer: Socialization is the lifelong process through which individuals internalize the norms, values, and behaviors of their society, playing a crucial role in shaping personal identity and facilitating integration into the social fabric. This process is significantly influenced by various agents of socialization, including family, peers, schools, and media, each contributing unique perspectives and expectations that mold an individual's self-concept and social roles. For instance, family provides the foundational beliefs and values that guide early behavior, while peer groups offer a space for identity exploration and social acceptance. Educational institutions further reinforce societal norms and introduce individuals to a broader social context, while media shapes perceptions and aspirations. Collectively, these agents create a complex interplay that not only defines individual identities but also ensures cohesion within society, highlighting the profound impact of socialization on both personal and communal levels.

Note: correct because it comprehensively describes socialization as a lifelong process that integrates individuals into society and shapes their identity, while also identifying and elaborating on the specific agents of socialization that contribute to this process.

12. Answer: Relative deprivation, as proposed by Townsend (1979), refers to the perception of being disadvantaged in comparison to others within a society, which can lead to feelings of discontent and social unrest. One indicator of this phenomenon is media consumption, where individuals with lower socio-economic status may buy fewer than twenty DVDs in the previous year, reflecting their limited financial resources and access to cultural products. This disparity in media consumption not only highlights the material inequalities present in society but also suggests a broader cultural exclusion, as individuals unable to afford such items may feel disconnected from mainstream narratives and entertainment. Thus, Townsend's concept of relative deprivation underscores the importance of examining how access to cultural goods can both reflect and perpetuate social inequalities.

Note: The answer correctly identifies relative deprivation as a perception of disadvantage compared to others, illustrating how disparities in media consumption among different socio-economic groups serve as a reflection of social inequality and limited access to cultural resources.
