

Multiple Choice

1. Answer: C

Options: A) insufficiently involved in the international capitalist economy; B) reluctant to surrender their traditional ways of life; C) economically dependent on the wealthy countries that exploited them; D) the 'metropolises' to which 'satellite' countries were attached

Note: Frank's assertion highlights the neocolonial dynamic in which economically underdeveloped societies are structurally dependent on affluent nations, which perpetuate their exploitation through unequal economic relationships and resource extraction.

2. Answer: B

Options: A) most of the characters in soap operas are women; B) they represent images of women as both domesticated and independent; C) they alienate women and appeal to an audience of men; D) female television producers are most likely to work in this area

Note: The correct answer highlights how soap operas portray women navigating traditional domestic roles while also exhibiting independence, reflecting the complexities of female identity in contemporary society, which aligns with Pilcher's identification of the genre as feminine.

3. Answer: D

Options: A) domesticating its content, including more 'home-produced' programmes; B) controlling the distribution of imported products by banning satellite dishes; C) creating 'reverse flows' of their own programmes back to imperial societies; D) all of the above

Note: Sreberny-Mohammadi (1996) contends that national cultures can resist American cultural domination through various mechanisms, including the promotion of local content, the reinforcement of cultural identity, and the active engagement of audiences, making "all of the above" the correct answer.

4. Answer: A

Options: A) individuals buying welfare privately, with some means-tested benefits; B) regular benefit payments to men as earners of the 'family wage'; C) a universalist system of welfare for all, regardless of income; D) decommodifying social welfare through state provision

Note: The market model of state welfare emphasizes the idea that individuals are responsible for purchasing their own welfare services in a competitive marketplace, supplemented by means-tested benefits to assist those with lower incomes, thereby promoting personal responsibility and efficiency in welfare provision.

5. Answer: D

Options: A) age; B) income; C) verbal fluency; D) occupation

Note: In modern societies, social status is often determined by occupation because it reflects an individual's economic position, level of education, and social influence, which are key indicators of status within the social hierarchy.

True / False

6. Answer: True

Options: A) True; B) False

Note: Ethnographic research involves immersive observation and participation in a community, which allows researchers to gather in-depth qualitative data that reflects the lived experiences and perspectives of individuals within that cultural context.

7. Answer: False

Options: A) True; B) False

Note: The statement is false because the Nation of Islam primarily attracted African American followers in the United States rather than British-born second generation immigrants from the Asian subcontinent, who have different cultural and religious backgrounds.

8. Answer: False

Options: A) True; B) False

Note: Differential association theory posits that individuals learn deviant behaviors through interactions with their environment and social groups, indicating that one's surroundings significantly influence the likelihood of engaging in deviance.

9. Answer: False

Options: A) True; B) False

Note: The 'third age' of the life course is characterized by a period of personal growth, leisure, and exploration that often occurs after retirement, rather than a focus on full-time employment and adult responsibilities.

10. Answer: False

Options: A) True; B) False

Note: Role-learning theory recognizes that social roles are dynamic and shaped by cultural, social, and individual interactions, allowing for change over time.

Long Form Response

11. Answer: The concept of the social construction of reality, as articulated by Berger and Luckmann, posits that individuals actively negotiate shared definitions of their experiences and social situations. This process is inherently dynamic, as individuals interpret and re-interpret their interactions within a social context, thus creating a collective understanding that shapes their reality. However, as these definitions become internalized, individuals often forget that their social worlds are not fixed or objectively determined; instead, they are fluid constructs that can change over time.

The implications of this phenomenon are profound, as it suggests that societal norms and values are not merely external forces but are continuously shaped and reshaped through individual and collective actions. This understanding encourages critical reflection on the taken-for-granted aspects of social life, highlighting the potential for change and the role of agency in the ongoing construction of reality.

Note: The answer correctly highlights that the social construction of reality involves dynamic negotiation of shared definitions among individuals, leading to internalized understandings that shape their perceptions of reality, emphasizing the fluid and non-fixed nature of social contexts.

12. Answer: Warner's findings on the 'colour line' in Natchez reveal a stark division between black and white castes, a manifestation of deep-seated social stratification in the region. This division is underpinned by pervasive beliefs in white superiority, which not only justified racial discrimination but also reinforced a hierarchy that privileged white individuals in all aspects of social life. The implications of this rigid caste system extend beyond mere segregation, as they reflect a broader societal consensus that regards racial differences as indicators of moral and intellectual worth. This entrenched ideology perpetuates systemic inequalities and fosters an environment where racial identities become central to individuals' social experiences and opportunities. Warner's work thus underscores the critical intersection of race, power, and social structure in understanding the dynamics of inequality in Natchez.

Note: correct because it accurately identifies the 'colour line' as a clear demarcation of social stratification in Natchez, highlighting how entrenched beliefs in white superiority perpetuated racial discrimination and maintained a hierarchical structure that favored whites.
