Long Form Response

11. Answer: Townsend's (1979) indicators of relative deprivation highlight the disparities in access to resources and opportunities that contribute to social inequalities. One such indicator is the purchasing of consumer goods, exemplified by the act of buying fewer than twenty DVDs in the previous year. This behavior reflects not only an individual's financial constraints but also their exclusion from cultural participation compared to peers who can afford more. The limited ability to engage in leisure activities, such as watching films, illustrates broader systemic inequalities, where socioeconomic status dictates lifestyle choices and access to cultural capital. Such indicators reveal the multifaceted nature of deprivation, emphasizing that social inequalities extend beyond mere income disparities to include the quality of life and social integration.

Note: correct because it illustrates how Townsend's indicators of relative deprivation, such as limited consumer purchasing, serve as a measure of social inequalities by highlighting individuals' financial constraints and their resulting exclusion from cultural and leisure activities compared to more affluent peers.

12. Answer: National surveys play a crucial role in understanding societal trends in the UK by providing empirical data that reflect public attitudes, behaviors, and demographic changes. These surveys, such as the British Social Attitudes Survey and the Labour Force Survey, offer insights into various aspects of life, including economic conditions, health, and social cohesion. In contrast, the Fashion Sensibility Survey, despite its potential value, is not regularly conducted by the government, likely due to its niche focus and the perception that fashion preferences are more subjective and less critical to policy-making compared to broader societal issues. This absence indicates a prioritization of surveys that yield data directly applicable to social welfare and economic stability, illustrating the government's strategic emphasis on pressing social matters over lifestyle trends.

Note: correct because it emphasizes the importance of national surveys in providing empirical data on societal trends, while also noting that the Fashion Sensibility Survey, despite its potential insights, is not prioritized by the government, likely due to its niche focus compared to broader, more impactful surveys.
