Long Form Response

11. Answer: Current research findings indicate that the unequal division of housework and childcare remains a significant issue among married couples, particularly when both partners are employed. Despite the increasing participation of women in the workforce, many men do not share the responsibilities of domestic labor equitably with their working wives. This disparity can perpetuate traditional gender roles and reinforce the notion that women are primarily responsible for home management, even when they are also contributing financially. The implications of this imbalance extend beyond the household, impacting women's career advancement, mental health, and overall societal perceptions of gender equality in both domestic and professional settings. Addressing these inequalities is essential for fostering a more equitable workplace and home environment.

Note: correct because it highlights the persistent gender inequality in domestic labor despite women's increased workforce participation, thereby illustrating how traditional gender roles are reinforced within the context of married couples.

12. Answer: Functionalist theory in sociology posits that society functions as a complex system whose components work together to promote stability and order. Key components of this theory include social institutions such as family, education, religion, and government, each contributing to the overall equilibrium by fulfilling specific roles and responsibilities. For instance, the family socializes children, while education imparts necessary skills and knowledge, reinforcing societal norms. Functionalists argue that when all parts of society function harmoniously, social order is maintained; disruptions, such as crime or inequality, signal that something is amiss within the system. Thus, the theory emphasizes the importance of collective consensus and shared values in preserving social stability.

Note: The answer correctly identifies functionalist theory as a perspective that views society as an interconnected system where various social institutions work collaboratively to maintain order and stability, highlighting the roles of family, education, religion, and government in this process.
