Long Form Response

11. Answer: Emergent-norm theory posits that in crisis situations, such as a car accident, individuals look to the behavior of others to determine appropriate responses, thereby creating new social norms. In such chaotic environments, pre-existing norms may become irrelevant, and individuals adapt by observing the actions of those around them, leading to a collective response that aligns with the newly formed norms. Factors influencing collective action include the perceived legitimacy of these emergent norms, the presence of leadership, and the level of emotional arousal among the individuals involved. By understanding how individuals negotiate norms in real-time, emergent-norm theory provides insight into the dynamics of social behavior during crises and highlights the importance of situational context in shaping collective actions.

Note: correct because it accurately describes how emergent-norm theory illustrates that individuals in a crisis, like a car accident, rely on the behaviors of others to establish new social norms for appropriate responses, while also identifying key factors that shape collective action in such situations.
